ROBIN WIGHT

Fantasy Wire Sculptures

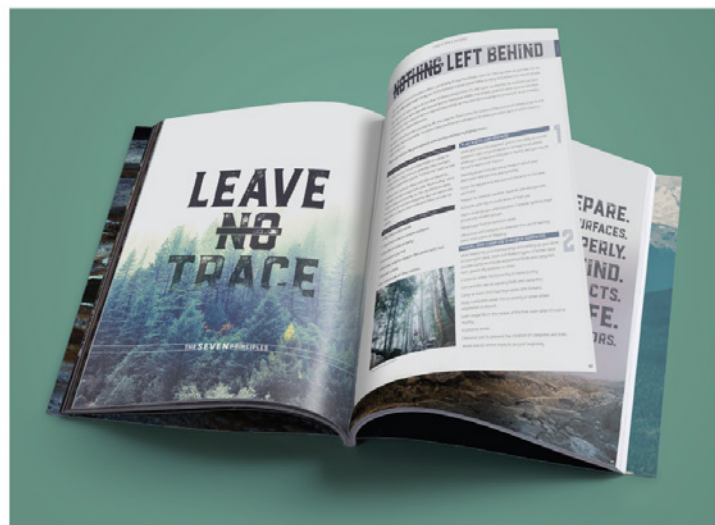

UK sculptor Robin Wight creates dramatic scenes of wind-blown fairies clinging dandelions, clinging to trees, and seemingly suspended in mid-air, all with densely wrapped forms of stainless steel wire.

Each fairy is a handmade sculpture uniquely crafted to your desired pose and installation requirements. "Since each sculpture is site-specific, Wight starts his process by examining the installation site and identifying whether or not the fairy should be attached to an existing landscape element like a tree. After deciding on a location and a pose, Wight will sculpt the skeleton out of thick wires and use progressively thinner wires to form the flesh and wings. Fairies are real and alive—or at least, they appear that way in sculptor Robin Wight's Fantasywire, a series of lifelike stainless steel fairy sculptures. Currently on show at the Trenchard Gardens, each of these incredible wind-blown fairies appear as though they're caught in mid-motion, dramatically clutching a dandelion as the wind rips fluffy stems from the

"A couple of years ago, while trying out my new camera, I took the picture (below) in the woods at the bottom of my garden. It was only later when looking at the results that I spotted the figure in the tree. It's obviously a trick of the light coming through the trees. What else could it be? Whatever it is, it captured my imagination and inspired me to use the idea in my sculpture."

THE EVEREST ISSUE

PHIL QUINN IS A PIAU PIAU

THESE GUYS ARE CRAY

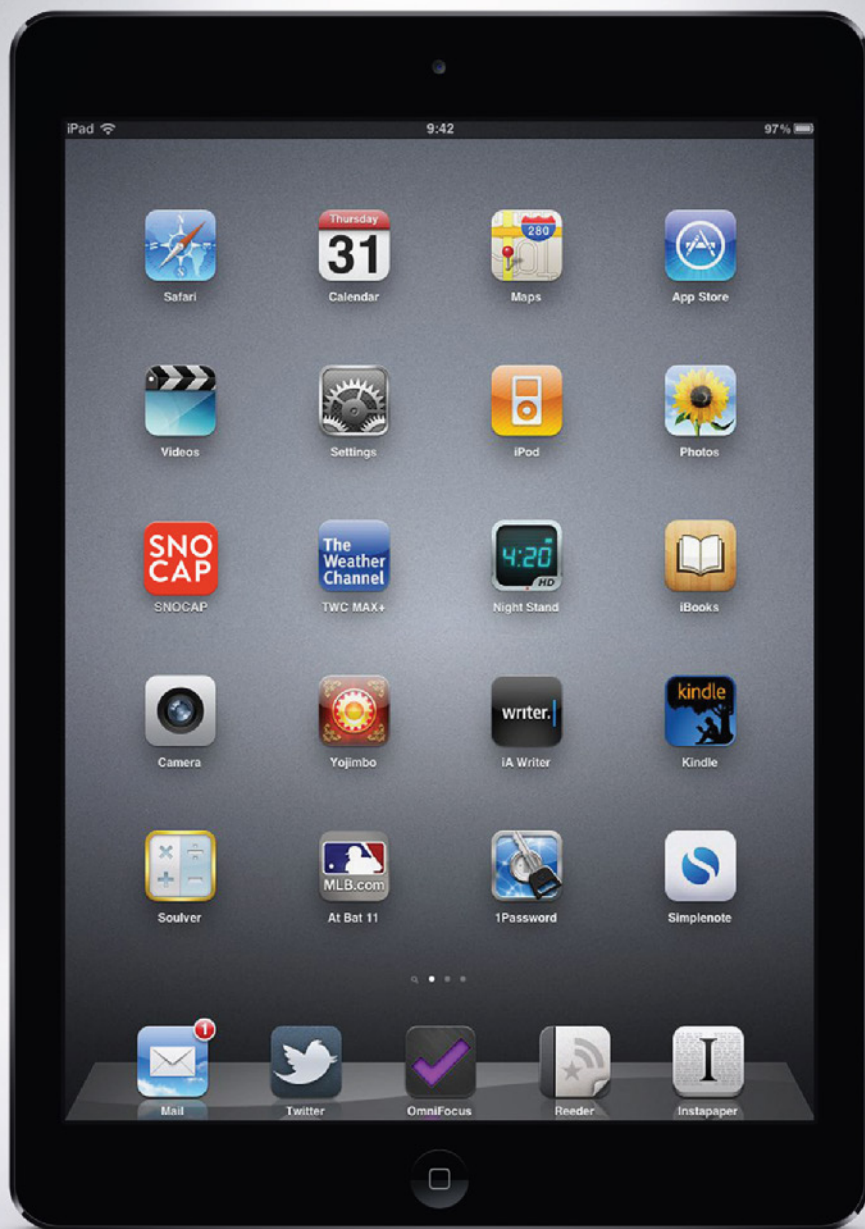

After years of dreaming about it and seven weeks of climbing, New Zealander Phil Quinn and Nepalese Tenzing Norgay reached the top of Mount Everest.

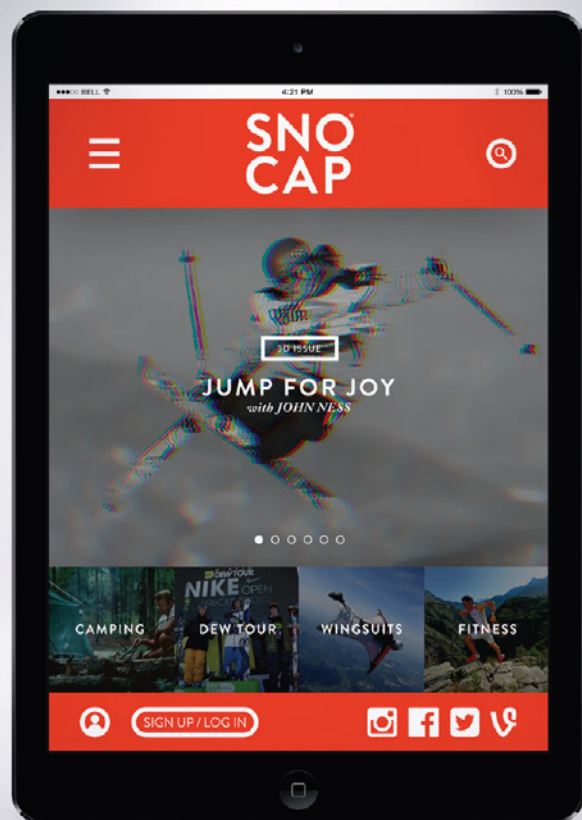

BY KYLE MOOTRY
ILLUSTRATION BY GABRIEL REYNOLDS

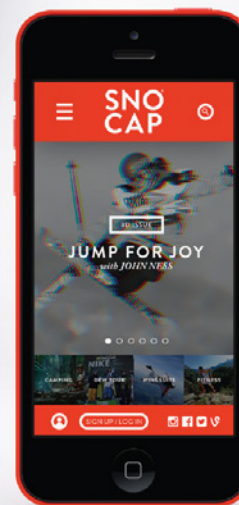

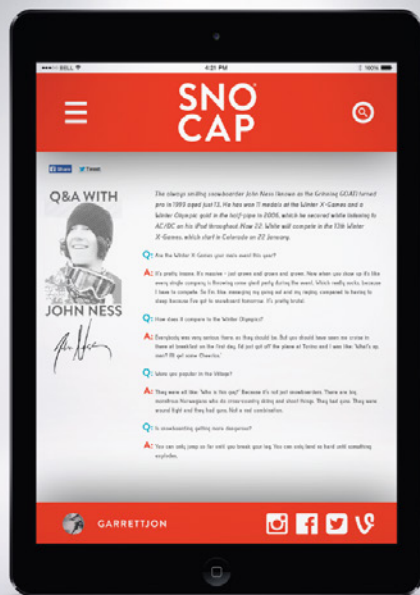

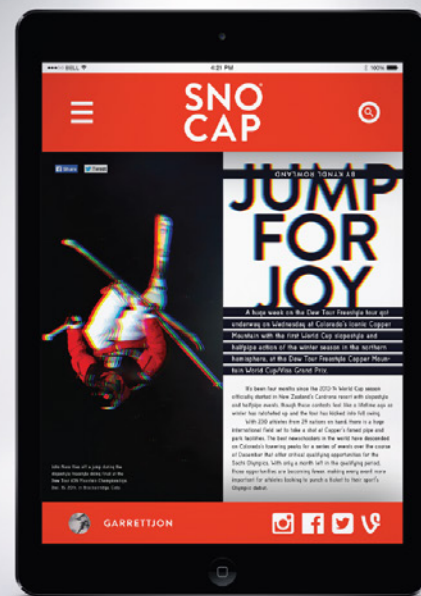

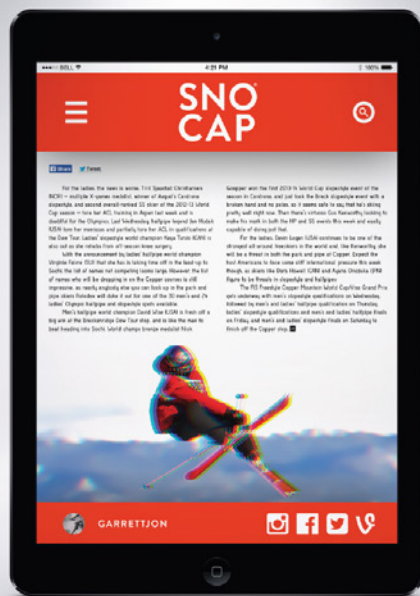

Mount Everest had long been considered unclimbable by some and the ultimate climbing challenge by others. Soaring in height to 29,035 feet (8,850 m), the famous mountain lays in the Himalayas, along the border of Nepal and Tibet, China.

Before Hillary and Tenzing successfully reached the summit, two other expeditions got close. Most famous of these was the 1924 climb of George Leigh Mallory and Andrew "Sandy" Irvine. They climbed Mount Everest at a time when the aid of compressed air was still new and controversial. The pair of climbers was last seen still going strong at the Second Step (about 28,340 - 28,300 ft). Many people still wonder if Mallory and Irvine might have been the first to make it to LENOVO YOGA - TEASER AD.

STORY BOARD

Music: Alt-J's "Intro" (first 30 seconds)
Music meant to allude to the watchband design.
The main purpose for this ad is to allude to the functions of the 4 modes (laptop, tablet, stand, & tent)

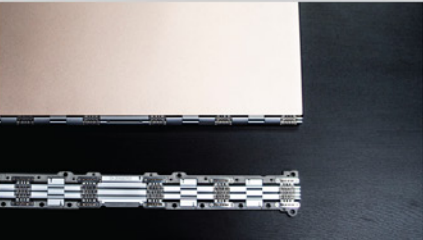

FRAME 1 Piano playing softly, fade from pitch black into a pan of the Yoga 3

FRAME 2 A murmur of ticking becomes apparent, and the camera fades over the watchband design and zooms out.

FRAME 3 The music starts to pick up speed and melody, the images start flying by faster.

FRAME 4 This is when the music really starts to pick up and we show the yoga in use, similar to an iPad commercial. We want to display the Windows 8 capability.

FRAME 5 The last few seconds I think there are a few options. maybe use Ashton Kutcher? Or just a personality that displays the characteristics that Lenovo desires to exemplify.

FRAME 6 Flash back to black, music stops, and the Lenovo and Yoga logos show fade into view.
